as no man is an island no home or a piece of property is its own environment is its own neighborhood. That is the same that would one person does affects what happens to another or but what happens when one land one piece of land or one piece of property reflects on what happens. Another piece is brought printing the entire history of, of cattle in the United States, particularly, particularly the that of cattle drives is a perfect example of this relationship as more and more farmers more and more cattlemen increasing numbers of their supplies like water land and other natural resources to dwindle. And as they to dwindle and as these resources became more scarce, thus, competition became steeper to access these natural resources this is one reason why our real estate laws and of real property exist like they do that is that one person can hold another accountable for financial losses that were incurred by changes and by actions and decisions that impacted the land and the land that surrounded them.

01:49

02:15

02:38

That's the basic story of the Wild West. That's one of the reasons why cattle cattlemen and cattle rustlers rustlers cattle drivers — moved that's one of the reasons they moved inland. Midwest as they went [REDACTED] in [REDACTED] to access those other resources, and those other natural resources those things which in itself should in state, the obvious, which is that natural resources and other resources that land provides is finite. They're not infinite
